

"Self-insured Workers' Compensation Fund Members"

Mental Health and Work

Research from the American Psychological Association suggests that, across all industries, lower level employees were more likely to experience the negative impacts of work-related stress and over 30 percent have felt fed up with work frequently or more often in the past 30 days.

Issues in the workplace can exacerbate the risk of experiencing mental health challenges. Combined, these stressors can make it more difficult for workers to get their tasks done; threaten their productivity, happiness, and well-being; and lead to burnout. Because of the many potential stressors' employees may be experiencing, a comprehensive approach is needed to address stressors throughout the community, and senior managers can be part of the solution.

The goal is to find ways to alleviate or remove stressors in the workplace to the greatest extent possible, build coping and resiliency supports, and ensure that people who need help know where to turn. Reducing workplace stress benefits everyone across an organization. It can improve morale and lead to increased productivity, fewer sick days, better focus, fewer workplace injuries, enhanced quality of life, and improved physical health (e.g., lower blood pressure, stronger immune system).

Five Essentials for Workplace Mental Health & Well-Being

Office of the U.S. Surgeon General

You can help workers by:

- Being aware and acknowledging that your supervisors and other workers may be experiencing heightened levels of loneliness, isolation, uncertainty, grief, and stress, and that some workers face extra demands, such as working parents; those caring for an elderly, medically vulnerable, or disabled family member; and those with existing mental health or substance use challenges.
- Identifying what factors are making it harder for supervisors and workers to get their jobs done and determining if adjustments can be made to lessen the burden.
  - Showing empathy and telling workers: They are not alone,
  - You recognize the stress they are under
  - There is no shame in feeling anxious, an Asking for help is important. Employers can reassure workers they are open and receptive to discussions about workplace stress by creating a safe and trustworthy space.
- Providing access to helpful coping and resilience resources or other supportive networks and services if needed.

CONTACT US TODAY! (800) 258-1152 | www.michigancountieswcf.org

Timothy K. McGuire
MCWCF Administrator
tmmac24@gmail.com

AJ Hale
CompOne Risk Mngt Services
ajhale@compone.net

Below is a list of helpful tips for senior managers to keep in mind as they address workplace stress.

- Be transparent.
- Avoid using negative or stigmatizing language when discussing mental health and workplace stress.
- Stay positive. Speak positively around all staff, as you never know who might be struggling with a mental health condition. Encourage supervisors and workers alike to use resources available through your company's employee assistance program or other publicly available websites (e.g., CDC, American Psychiatric Association, World Health Organization, and Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration).
- Listen without judgment. When a staff member reaches out to you, listen without judgement, and acknowledge their feelings. Offer help or resources if available and warranted.
- Be understanding and accept that supervisors and workers may not be able to exhibit the same level of productivity.
- Offer assistance to supervisors and workers. Ask whether their workload has increased and look for ways to reassign or prioritize tasks to help minimize their workplace stress. Just because a worker is not vocal about an increased workload, it does not mean they are not struggling.
- Model exemplary behavior. Be a good role model by demonstrating self-care behaviors (e.g., getting enough sleep, exercising, taking time off), and defining and adhering to work schedule boundaries.
- Adequately train supervisors. Train front-line supervisors about mental health issues so they have the skills and confidence to have discussions with workers and can recognize the signs and symptoms of emotional distress.

What to Say and Ways to Say It

Talking about experiences and feelings can help workers cope during challenging times. When having a conversation, workers want to be heard, acknowledged, and understood. Managers/Supervisors may use these tips to start a conversation.

Set the Stage

- Be flexible about the format—hold a conversation over the phone, in-person, or via video chat.
- Put away or silence devices and give workers your undivided attention.
- Before starting a conversation, ensure that you can be positive, supportive, and patient and that you have sufficient time to dedicate to the conversation.

What to Say

- Reduce stigma upfront by telling workers you recognize their stress, and it is normal for them to feel anxious.
- Consider sharing an experience about your own stress level or mental health to show your personal side and make the other person feel more comfortable.
- Ask open-ended questions to get the conversation started, such as:
  - How are you feeling?
  - How is it going for you these days?
  - How are you keeping in touch with your support system (e.g., family and friends)?
  - Are you struggling with any new job-related burdens? If so, do you have thoughts about
    - what could be done to lessen them?
    - How can I help?
- Show concern and sympathy and validate workers' feelings by using phrases like "I'm so sorry," "I understand," "That sounds difficult," or "How can I help?"
- Be respectful of a worker's privacy and understand they might not be open to sharing. In this instance, offer resources for more information.

How to Listen

- Practice active listening by engaging with the person or persons you are talking to and showing that you acknowledge and understand his/her/their message.
- Respond in a respectful manner without being judgmental or defensive about what the other person has said.

Use these tips:

- Make sure your body language is open and inviting (e.g., face turned toward the person you are talking to, eyes open, arms and legs not crossed).

- Avoid thinking about what you will say next.
- Show that you understand what someone is telling you by paraphrasing what you heard.
- Ask questions to clarify points.
- Don't interrupt.
- Acknowledge workers' feelings. Offer help or resources if available and warranted.

Follow-up

- Finish on a positive note. When ending a conversation with workers, mention something positive the company has accomplished because of their work and remind them you are available to talk more if needed.
- Schedule group meetings. Hold group meetings to promote connectedness and provide a forum for workers to voice concerns, ask questions, and receive information about ways to cope with stress.
- Take stock of your own mental health. Respect the limits of what you can do and maintain healthy boundaries to avoid becoming overwhelmed by the events at hand.

Email Guide and Examples

As a leader in your organization, you set the tone with messaging for how workers will respond to workplace stress. Your own sense of calm, focus, and self-assurance will play a significant role in easing the stress of those around you. Use the tips below when drafting organization-wide emails:

- As soon as you can, compose and send a message to your staff acknowledging workplace stress and mental health issues and explaining that you want to be open about them and find ways to reduce stressors and support your staff.
- Communication should take place regularly to help alleviate the stress of uncertainty and defuse misinformation and rumors that might be circulating.
- Tell staff it is natural to feel stressed, encourage them to seek help if needed, and explain how they can get help.
- If your organization has an employee assistance program, regularly remind workers what benefits are included and encourage them to use them.
- Emphasize the importance of addressing workplace stress and supporting worker mental health and well-being